From the New York Mirror. " THE ADVENTURES OF A SAILOR.

Miery sequilities man with strange bed fellows." Inever pared upon a fine ship without e-motion. It fills my mind with atriking ima-ges, and seems like a messenger from the o-ther world. It teems with spirit-stirring as-sociations of dangers and wonders; of fields where the earth is clothed with a different creature secutions of dangers and wonders; of fields where the earth is clothed with a different werders of climes where man and flature are seen inder surprising forms; and where the skies; of climes where man and flature are seen inder surprising forms; and where the very fursthat crend out upon the soft blue floor of heaven like maskers at a revel, would flish on me with strange faces, and in noticing groups. Immortal Jove, what a sensation! to gaze upon the broad sky, and miss the very constellations you have traced since your colddhood, or to behold them in such altered positions that you are bewildered even there, where, at home, through every change in the field hearts about you, these ever watchful and familiar friends were sure to be constant. How the mind of one who has sojourned for years in a single spot, contracts with the perpetual contemplation of its petty features, its common-place insignificant interests, its barries, its friendships, its loves! How it opens and expansis, as if endowed with new attributes, when borne from the narrow circle, shroad over opposite quarters of this revolving globe, where even the common earth and the exercisating heavens speak to it in a glorious transletiest the flood of vast thought rushing through my mind, simild overwhelm and wash sway a world of pleasant prejudices and simple tests; and, as some plulosophers have interest power of the earth as to prevent its return, so the implementation of the possibility of propelling an object so far beyond the attractive power of the earth as to prevent its return, so the implementation of the possibility of propelling an object so far beyond the attractive power of the earth as to prevent its return, so the implementation of the earth as to prevent its return, so the implementation of the earth as to prevent its return, so the implementation of the earth as to prevent its return, so the implementation of the earth as to prevent its return, so the implementation of the earth as to prove the common of the earth as to prove the eart lared took every restraint. He also burned to fig from this tedious routine of stale objects and melancholy meditations; and was eger to depart, as a prisoner is to be released from his dungeon. He longed to see the sheres of his native land melting away, list tankers of his native land melting away, list and suff bounding over the waters in one of those vinged creatures, and perusing with his own true. He had been quick and studious at the local true. He had been quick and studious at sthool, and had therefore acquired a good within reseach wonder in the page of life and are and any tree. He had been quick and studious at school, and had therefore acquired a good education, although his parents, who heid a respectable station in ecciety, died before he was fourteen. The four succeeding years were spent in heart-sickening struggles among the crowd for leave to breather the air of heaven and keep up the poor existence of which leshad already grown weary. Every month russ fraught with labout unrewarded, and lapp mocked. Disappointment, humiliation, insult, at length, drove him to a species of desperation. He saw rothing before him but the prospect of want and musers, and nothing friend friend. his peace. He saw nothing before him but the prospect of want and misers, and nothing in the retrospect but youth's clear and sunny ranquility now passed away forever. To such a being a shap was full of fascination, and it was not long before he found himself to board the good brig Commerce, bound to the E. Indies. Alas! how different is the reality from our interpations of it! The farther he sailed from his once despised home, the more strongly his heart yearned towards it. The gloririck of shedding lustre upon things which, trick of shedding lustre upon things which, it real life, are dark and miserable. Poor it real life, are dark and miserable, this is old dreams of the sea, while watching the list old dreams of the sea, while watching the life as the law like a rock upon the smooth. Tem soon discovered the difference between his old dreams of the sea, while watching the vessel as she lay like a rock upen the smooth water of the harbour, the silver-created ripples breaking against her side, and the toil of the labouring mariners when the brig hung upon mountainous hillows, or shook as they inhundered over her deck. Behold the young silor boy treading his native fields on his way from home, with the beauty of youth in his countenance, and its light in his heart, and you will scarcely recognize in him the must he went work, submissive like as dog to his master's commands, deneched with the wintry waves, stiffened with cold and tail, creening from his birth at midsight, just as the tigney-heavy dew of slumber" had sealed his eyes, and forced to mount the realing most amid the roar of surger.
